Rugby 101 - The Basics

The aim of rugby, like American football, is to successfully get the ball over the goal line (called a try line in rugby) into the end zone (called the in-goal in rugby). Once you get there you have to successfully get the ball to ground under control in order to actually score a try. Doing so gets the attacking team 5 points and an attempt to convert for an additional 2 points.

One major difference between the two sports is that all passes in rugby must be made laterally or backwards. To successfully move the ball forward, without passing forward, requires that your support players be all behind you.

The ball is moved as quickly as possible by the team in possession to areas of the field where there is the greatest amount of space through which they can penetrate and move the ball forward. At times, the team in possession will concede that the defensive cover is such that there is little or no space available. At this time they may choose to kick the ball into space behind the defensive line in the hopes of recovering possession - either by chasing the ball down and getting to it before the defence can arrive, or by arriving in sufficient numbers to put pressure on the opposition and make them turn over the ball.

The other option when no lateral space is available is to seek contact with the opposition thereby creating a maul (when the ball remains in the arms of the attacker in contact who is on his feet) or a ruck (when the ball goes to ground in the tackle). At this time players from both teams regroup around the ball in an attempt to maintain or steal possession. This act, particularly when done repeatedly, will result in a number of players being grouped together in a small space and is often used as a tactic to create space into which a team can attack with ball in hand.

Minor infringements of the rules are penalized with a scrum awarded to the team that did not commit the error. At this time eight players (the forwards) from each team come together and push against each other as a unit and the ball is introduced into the tunnel between them. One team wins possession and play continues as described above.

Major infringements are penalized with penalty kicks. These may be run, kicked up field for better field position or kicked at goal (between the uprights). Successfully kicking at goal gains the team 3 points on the scoreboard.

When the ball goes out of bounds it results in a line-out, where the forwards from both teams line up opposite each other and one player throws the ball into the tunnel between the two teams. Each team attempts to gain possession so that they can once more attempt to move down field and score.

Let the game begin - and may the fitter, faster, stronger leave the field victorious.
